was not accurate. And in fact, since it's my colleague, I want to make sure that in the record I speak clearly and directly. I said what I thought was a...not only a true thing, but also a...I meant it to be a witty thing, in which I had said that if you asked Chris about a question, you'd get the whole history of the issue, three different perspectives, and then a fourth one explaining why that was the best idea, that he thinks strategically and is incapable of speaking in sound bites, and in politics that's like speaking in tongues--a reference to my mother, who followed religious mystical phenomenon with great interest. And the speaking of tongues was when you spoke in another language. It was meant to say that in fact if one speaks very, very completely about an issue, it's almost as if it was antithetical to the way we do business in politics, which is to simplify and turn everything into a sound bite. It was meant to say that he was a deep thinker and he spoke persuasively. Somehow, in the quote the phrase became: and in politics that's like speaking with dual tongues. Huge difference between speaking in tongues and speaking in dual tongues. I want the record to reflect, and all of my colleagues to understand, that I hold an unalloyed admiration for my colleague Chris Beutler. I find that his conversation is candid, authentic, and never speaks, with my knowledge, with dual tongues. How the error came about I don't know. I was given the opportunity to correct it, but I only found it on Saturday, and didn't do it in a timely fashion. By the way, when that quote was done, I was asked, do you think that might have hurt him when he ran for Governor? I said, it may have. However, between that statement and where it appears in the article, there's somebody else's thought, and that somebody else's thought was that on the campaign trail maybe there was not an adroitness in the coffee shop. Well, that's not what I said. And I want...I'm not terribly concerned about things that get into the public record in the newspaper that are wrong. What I want my colleagues to know is exactly what I said and what I meant, and that is that I have the utmost admiration, and I think that Senator Beutler speaks very directly and with great authenticity with what he says. And I did not say, and I want to correct the record, that I think while he may speak in tongues, it's because he speaks in full and complete, strategic and well-informed political thought and political philosophy.
